1. Field of the Invention This invention relates generally to metal matrix composites and, more particularly, to an intermetallic composition, which is especially useful as a matrix material for cold welding, and the composite made therefrom, including cold-weldable intermetallic alloys having intermetallic phases of NiAl, Ni<sub>3</sub>Al, or NiAl<sub>2</sub> which have a non-crystalline morphological structure that is beneficial for cold welding purposes.

2. Discussion of the Related Art NiAl-Cu alloys have been known in the art for many years as having superior strengths at elevated temperatures as compared to the currently used heat treatable alloys, such as Inconel and Hastelloy. Typically, however, these materials exhibit a yield strength of only less than 895 MPa (130 ksi). Recent advances in high-energy density materials, typically dielectric and magnetic materials, have given rise to a demand for solid state materials having even higher strength. One approach which has been used to improve the strength of NiAl-Cu alloys is to add the alloying element in a finely dispersed form, that is, "microalloying". U.S. Pat. No. 4,981,629 to Nakamura et al discloses that NiAl-Cu alloys can be strengthened by homogenously dispersing the second element, typically Ag, to the grain boundaries of the base matrix material. The process of adding a finely dispersed second element to a NiAl-Cu alloy is typically referred to as microalloying. In order to maximize the strength of the nickel aluminide matrix, it has been found that the microalloying of the second element should occur at the highest possible concentration in the grain boundaries. However, Nakamura et al discloses that the strength of NiAl-Cu alloys is reduced when the microalloyed second element is added to the alloy in higher concentration than that required to be located at the grain boundaries. The latter reference teaches, therefore, that it is necessary to use very low levels of the second element to be located in the crystal grains in order to maximize the strength. However, lower levels of dispersion of the second element within the crystal grains, generally less than 20 atomic percent, are highly detrimental to cold-workability. Therefore, nickel aluminide materials which exhibit high strength have not been considered useful materials for cold work. The present invention seeks to provide
