Ethernet has gained a wide acceptance in the networking community because of its low cost, ease of installation, and speed. An Ethernet network typically is formed by a plurality of Ethernet devices (which may be connected to a common medium) that communicate with each other over Ethernet segments connected by Ethernet bridges and switches. A segment is a connection between two bridges or between a bridge and a switch or an end station. The Ethernet architecture is a completely distributed architecture in that there is no central controller. However, each network device may be set to be a hub, a repeater, a bridge, or a switch. In a hub or a simple bridge, all of the data traffic is broadcast or flooded to all nodes on that segment. Thus, each node is connected to all other nodes on the segment. A repeater has a segment address associated with it. Ethernet repeaters are devices that are connected to different ports on the same segment. A repeater receives a broadcast or multicast message, stores it, and then retransmits it on the segment, or some other segment, specified in the original message. In other words, bff6bb2d33
