“We have worked tirelessly over the last three years to ensure we could bring HyperMotion to life,” said Dave Rolton, senior producer, FIFA. “FIFA is about bringing players’ unique style and skills to life on the pitch. Using our new system, we are now able to capture the on-field action, allowing us to sculpt player movement and provide an environment that intuitively mirrors life on the pitch.” FIFA 22 has been built from the ground up with HyperMotion, as well as a brand new netcode and many gameplay refinements. The brand new Player Impact Engine (PIE) uses our brand new Physically Based Ball Physics engine to accurately reflect the speed, power and control of a players aerial balls. The engine is also used on Player Impact, which captures movement, action and emotion in the player and the ball. “The new ball physics were essential to the gameplay and the development of the game, and we are thrilled to see how we have been able to accurately portray the speed, power and control of an aerial ball,” added Rolton. The movement of the game has also been dramatically improved, with the game now utilizing a brand new physics-based artificial intelligence (AI) engine. AI running off the ball and tracking back into space, anticipating plays, dekeing, sliding tackles and turning down the number 10 and 15 spots will all become a reality. Players will also anticipate when they are being beaten, adjusting their speed and anticipation to react to what the player in front is doing. “In a game where all the action is happening on the pitch, players must now defend and run with the ball,” said David Rolton. “Our artificial intelligence engine ensures that every virtual football match feels authentic and adds to the intensity of the action.” When it comes to handling this evolution in game engine, HyperMotion captures this on-pitch play and generates a realistic representation of the game. The engine uses real-life player data, dynamically creating a tailored experience across all elements of the game. Off the ball, the play of players and the game is closer to a first-person experience. Players run, and run with the ball, receive the ball, recover the ball and turn and move around the pitch. Players are also able to deke, feint, dribble, slide tackle and create off the ball movement.
