Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a process for converting at least a part of carbonaceous residues, such as industrial slag from the iron industry, into an iron ore base metal, such as silicon-containing iron ore. 2. Description of the Prior Art Industrial slag is produced in the production of steel at the slag pouring step, and at the blast furnace step, before the iron is melted into steel and sent to the continuous casting step. At the melting point of slag, which is usually at about 1,700.degree. C, it is in a molten state, which makes it possible for it to be subjected to various treatments, such as melting, washing and recovery, after which it is reduced in size to an appropriate form. In the process for producing iron from liquid iron, steel production proceeds by using oxygen and/or carbon in the iron production step. Therefore, when the liquid iron is to be reduced, carbide or graphite is added in the form of an iron carbide, such as silicon carbide, or graphite in the form of coke, and the mixture of iron and such carbide or graphite is preheated to 800.degree.-1,400.degree. C. The thus preheated carbide or graphite is mixed with the molten iron so that oxygen, carbon and iron are dissolved therein to produce molten 595f342e71
