Stockholm Model The Stockholm Model, or more colloquially, the Stockholm syndrome, is a psychological phenomenon in which hostages develop psychological bonds with their captors. The syndrome is named after the Stockholm suburb of Arlanda, where a number of hostage scenarios have occurred, especially in Sweden. The term was first coined in the early 1980s by psychologist James Farr, who initially proposed that individuals who are threatened by an aggressor and who are placed in a position of physical or psychological confinement develop an empathy with the aggressor. According to Farr, these individuals begin to experience psychological bonds with their aggressor, and this in turn is related to their perceptions of the situation. The Stockholm Model has been criticized for a number of reasons, including that it confounds empathy with sympathy, that it is over-generalized, and that it is likely to be over-reproduced because it is easy to teach and present. Examples A hostage situation that has been widely used as an example of the Stockholm syndrome is the James J. Lee incident in 1981, in which four militants who had hijacked a Korean Airlines 747 took 70 passengers as hostages. During the crisis, the assailants played on the fears of the hostages by telling them that they were being held captive by US forces because of a US plan to invade the Soviet Union. The US government had no plans to invade the Soviet Union. Many of the hostages were able to remain convinced that this statement was true. Those hostages who knew the statement to be false were quickly isolated and restrained. Another example of a hostage situation that has been associated with the Stockholm syndrome is the Alfred Hitchcock kidnapping plot in 1983, when a man claiming to be a Canadian psychologist named Gilbert Robert Harris went on a killing spree in Canada. He forced his victims to accompany him to a remote location, where they were forced to drink cyanide-laced coffee. At the last moment, Harris handed the victims poisoned cups. The victims all survived. Harris himself was killed by a sniper shot. In 2003, Harris was posthumously convicted of murder. It was the first criminal trial in which the Stockholm syndrome was used as a legal defense. Consequences Although the Stockholm syndrome has been widely studied, many researchers have expressed skepticism about its existence. In 1995, journalist Andrew Ky

In order to completely analyze the performance of your website, we need to perform a load test on your website. To this end, we would need a browser (any browser, such as Firefox, Safari, Chrome, or Internet Explorer) to load your website and test your website's performance. If your website is hosted in a shared web host, we will need your permission to install and run the test in our sandbox. This is the same method used by Mozilla to test the performance of its website. This test will help us in analysing the performance of your website, and in making suggestions on how to improve your site's performance. We will then provide you with a detailed report on your website's performance. This analysis will be at our cost, and we will charge an amount equivalent to the cost of hosting your website for a year. One of the areas of improvement you can improve on, is the website's loading time. If your website takes more than 4 seconds to load, chances are, you will lose potential traffic. It is always good to have a website with the fastest possible loading time. In order to achieve this, we will first need to run a speed test on your website. We will install a browser on a virtual machine (VM) to load your website.
